

Wine

our legacy, our treasure

Although the Santa Clara Valley is the oldest winemaking region in California — with the first varietals brought here from Spain in 1777— it has been a long road to the thriving industry we see today. It's hard to think of our growing wine industry without thinking "we've come a long way baby." But from the increasing number of wineries to the quality of the wines they produce, it is undeniable that our South Valley wine industry is bursting with potential and alive with a very promising future.

We thank the participating wineries who are included in these pages. We hope that our readers will take the time to experience their offerings and share some awesome wine adventures with family and friends.

South Valley Wineries

Rich in History

An excerpt from Images of America, Wineries of Santa Clara Valley by Bev Stenehjem

The wineries of Santa Clara Valley have a rich history, dating back to the 1700s. First came the Spaniards, then the Frenchmen, and finally the Italians. The secret was out, the mild climate here in Santa Clara Valley was ideal, not only for growing vines, but also for living comfortably. The Spanish padres founded Mission Santa Clara in 1777 and seeing snarls of native grapevines climbing the trees along the creeks and valley, they knew that their grape cuttings would thrive here. Although the quality of the wine varied, much of it was crude and mostly used for religious purposes.

In the mid-1800s, the French started to arrive, first lured to the Sierra Mountains by the Gold rush and then settling in the San Jose area for all the good land available. The French greatly improved the quality of wines by planting the right varietals and employing years of established techniques to improve vineyard health and grape quality.

By 1880, the Italians came in droves, bringing their fruit-growing skills and hard work ethic to share in the bounty of the Santa Clara Valley. The Italians did most of the pruning, with centuries of best practices behind them.

Thousands of acres were planted in grapevines. Most of the young wine was sold to the growing population and restaurants in San Francisco-oftentimes finished and blended there for further sale and shipped off to other parts of the country.

The booming wine industry almost ground to a halt in the early 1900s. First, phylloxera appeared-a tiny, sap-sucking aphid that threatened to wipe out most of the vineyards. As winemakers struggled to stop the devastation of this pest, in 1906, the San Francisco earthquake hit. The resulting fires destroyed 15 million gallons of wine and several major wine cellars.

With little time to recuperate from phylloxera and the earthquake, Prohibition started in 1920, criminalizing the manufacture and sale of wine. And to cap it all off, the Great Depression began in 1929. People could hardly afford bread, let alone wine.

Many of our wineries tore out their remaining vineyards and sought other ways to make a living. However, more than a few of our valley winemakers stayed the course, keeping their vineyards alive by either selling their wine to a church (which was legal) or secretly selling their wines to people of all walks of life, including the police and other government officials. Trapdoors, secret cellars, and get-away cars were the name of the game. With the end of Prohibition in 1933, the wineries slowly made a comeback. For the next 30 years or so, most wine was called jug wine. People would bring their own jugs to the wineries and ask for a fill up. They had two choices: red or white. Wines were usually a blend of several kinds of grapes, and the varietals or vintage years were not specified.

In the mid-1900s, the Santa Clara Valley was a profusion of orchards and vineyards from one end to the other. Our wine region famously became called the Valley of Heart's Delight.

When the Judgment of Paris occurred in 1976, the California wine industry exploded. At a blind tasting of French and American wines, an all-French panel of wine experts awarded the top honors to several California wines. Mayhem ensued when the French wine judges learned that the California wines had won. Several of the judges stormed out in protest, bitterly denouncing the contest.

The mystique of Old World, French wines gave way to the New World of California wines as the finest in the world. In fact,

Rich in History

California produces such excellent wine that 90 percent of all American wine is produced in California, ranking the Golden State just behind Italy, France and Spain as the top-producing wine grower in the world.

To this day, the Santa Clara Valley remains the first premier winegrowing region in the state and is home to many world-class, award-winning wineries. Thanks to nearby Silicon Valley, our vineyards employ state-of-the-art technology measuring soil, moisture, wind, and temperature conditions. Our wines are now labeled to specify varietals and vintage year.

Our winemakers and owners are farmers at heart. They talk constantly about how the very quality of their wine starts in the vineyard. Although Mother Nature is a strong influence on the outcome of the grape quality, each winemaker has his or her own technique and skill to bring the best tasting wine to consumers' glasses. Winemaking is part science, part art form, and, some would say, part magic.

Despite the quality wines being produced here in the South Valley, visitors and even some residents still express surprise to learn that there are so many wineries between Morgan Hill and Gilroy. To their delight, they are finding out that each winery offers its own ambience, decor, and accommodations, a different feel for just about any mood or personality, ranging from Old World elegance to rustic, contemporary, or even whimsical. Some wineries offer sweeping views, bocce ball courts, picnic tables, and deli items. Year-round events include live music concerts, cooking demonstrations, holiday fairs, and wine-stomping contests. But for all their differences, all are far from pretentious. They are still family owned and operated. Some winemakers even have day jobs, juggling two careers at once. It is common to find the owners and/or the winemakers on the premises, if not in the tasting rooms, happy to pour a sip and answer any questions.
